Military Career

A clone who was referred to as “Defective” early on, although no genetic changes from any other. He was held to very low standards from the start of Clone Academy, but that just meant he could prove everyone wrong. He quickly flew through his training and became top of his class all the way to his phase three, making friends along the way. He was selected to lead a group, which he invited his friends to join. They were the fastest graduating class to beat the Citadel, becoming Top Cadets. Because of this, he was offered a spot to try out for the Republic Commandos, which he instantly accepted. He and his friends from the academy all attended the tryout and passed Phase 1, being the top 8 of about 25 people. However, during Phase 2, technical errors occurred, leading to everyone being forcefully failed, but without letting this hold him, “Scorch” joined the 212th, planning to show his brothers his leadership capabilities.

After joining the 212th Attack Battalion, he instantly felt welcomed and at home by his brothers, knowing this was where he belonged as he befriended and grew close to several other members, quickly ranking up. Not long after, he was a leader of his own squad, taking them from mission to mission, following all orders given to him. Then the deaths began with several 212th members, his friends falling in battles as the deaths weighed on him. He knew he couldn't sit around, so he left his previous company, “Recon” and went to the frontlines, knowing he could not stay in the back lines of combat as his brothers died.

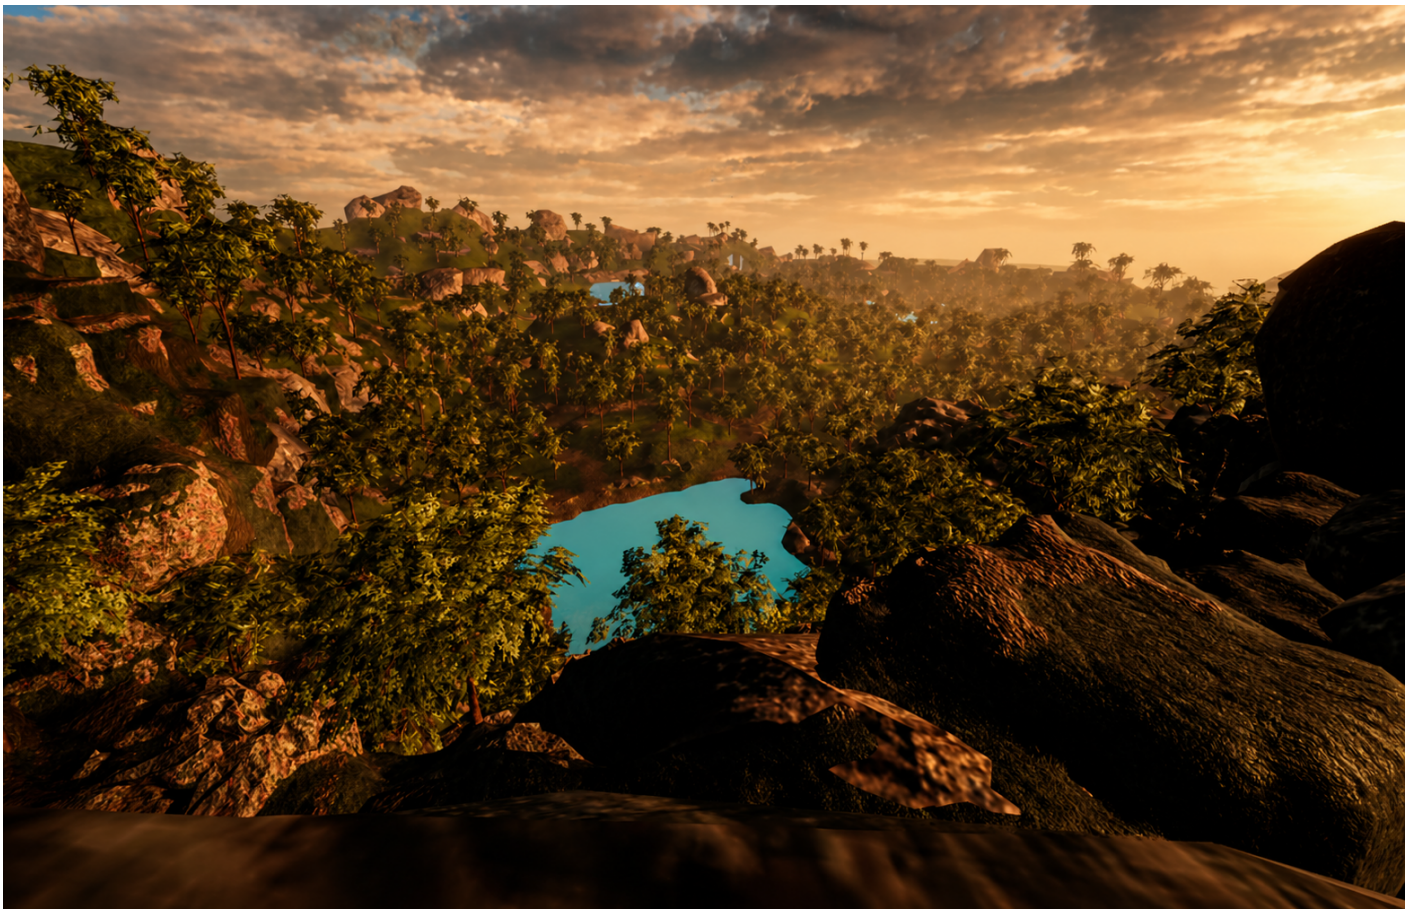

Notable Engagements

Carida War

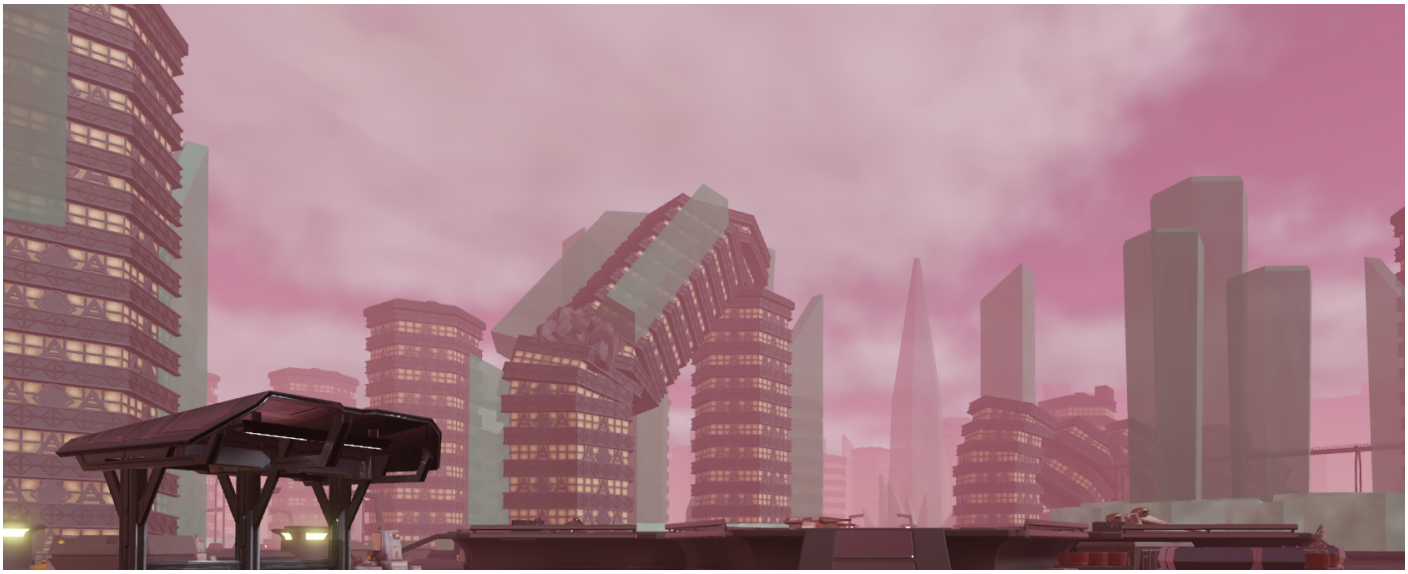

During a catastrophic defensive failure now referred to as the Wall Massacre, Serce was the sole surviving member of his unit after a coordinated enemy breakthrough. This event marked his transition from a standard trooper to an ARC trooper.

During the Carida War on Pirates, Serce was a Captain of a BARC company, He led high-speed reconnaissance and strike operations across the Carida front. Under his command, the company maintained the lowest casualty rate of any deployed unit during the war. His use of mobile warfare, staggered engagement zones, and preemptive extraction routes minimized losses even in high-risk operations; also, the only significant casualties sustained under his command came during direct encounters with Asajj Ventress, engagements in which Serce adapted quickly, ordering disengagements rather than sacrificing troops in unwinnable duels.

Christophsis Campaign

Serving as a Captain, Serce was responsible for mission planning across multiple operations, working closely with his Lieutenant to coordinate troop movements, supply lines, and orbital support. When his Commander was incapacitated mid-campaign, Serce assumed full battalion command without formal promotion. He successfully coordinated close air support with Republic Navy forces, executing synchronized assaults that broke entrenched CIS positions. Led all of 87th as an acting commander during Samson's absence multiple times. Worked closely and coordinated well with navy, 501st, and 41st during every mission. Commanded all of 87th for the Capital City District of Christophsis.

Ryloth

As Colonel, Serce assumed full operational control of his battalion while his Commander was listed as Leave of Absence. Without direct oversight, he planned and executed every mission across the campaign. In one of the most notable engagements, Serce led a 30-man force deep into CIS-controlled territory to capture a fortified forward outpost. Through careful planning, staggered assaults, and controlled aggression, the objective was secured with only three casualties, an outcome considered exceptional given the circumstances. His leadership during Ryloth solidified his reputation as a commander capable of sustaining high operational success with minimal losses, even in isolation.
