

Ashas

Overview

Ashas is a temperate Outer Rim world where disciplines are practiced side by side. Vast manufacturing facilities and regulated infrastructure are built around deep mineral reserves and a highly experienced workforce, ensuring a consistent economic output for generations.

These facilities produce a steady flow of refined materials, logistical equipment, and standardized military supplies, forming the backbone of Ashas' industrial capacity and strategic relevance. Infrastructure is structured, efficient, and heavily organized, reflecting a planetary focus on consistency and reliability rather than rapid expansion.

Society and Culture

Ashas maintains a balanced identity shaped by both industry and restraint. In the lowlands, daily life revolves around industrial output, coordination, and structured work cycles. The population is largely composed of workers, engineers, administrators, and Republic-aligned personnel who contribute directly to planetary production.

In contrast, the Ashas Temple serves as a place of reflection, training, and guidance. Rather than acting as a major center of power, it functions as a waypoint for Jedi traveling through the Inner Rim and as a quiet space for meditation during periods of instability.

The lands surrounding the temple are strictly protected, forming a rare zone untouched by industrial expansion. This separation has created a cultural dynamic where discipline is expressed not only through work, but through restraint, maintaining a clear boundary between progress and preservation.
